“The place of justice is a hallowed place”, quoted Regional Senior Justice Helen M. Pierce as she delivered her remarks during a Special Sitting of the Court in honour of the 100th Anniversary of the Rainy River District Court House here last Wednesday.

Taken from the Essays of Sir Francis Bacon in 1625, Justice Pierce explained that in those few, poignant words, Bacon acknowledged the value of the law to society, a value that we recognize to this day.

“I think of the law as a river that flows through time. Having lapped up against our ancestors, it glides past us, and will travel onward to touch our descendants. As a judge, I am part of that river. Many judges have preceded me, many judges will follow”, said Justice Pierce in her eloquent speech to mark the occasion.

“The law may be mankind’s most elegant creation. Over the centuries, we have learned that a principled approach to human interaction is a better way of solving disputes than violence.

The law was so important to civil society that it became institutionalized in special buildings we call court houses”.

She went on to explain that court houses were constructed to promote the exchange of ideas in an orderly way.

“They are also designed so that members of the community can listen, observe, and form their own judgments about a case. The court room is an open place. It belongs to the community”.

Prior to the court house being built in 1913-14, there was the construction of a jail in Fort Frances in 1907-08. Until the court house was built, a temporary court room and judge’s chambers were set up at the Fort Frances Town Hall.

The Chief Architect for the construction of the Court House was Mr. F.R. Heakes and the tender for the building was awarded to the Fort William firm of Seaman and Penman.

“The contract price for the building is reported at what now seems like the modest sum of $54,719”, noted Justice Pierce.

The space was utilized for the court room as well as a judge’s chambers, a jury room, a law library and offices for the court recorder and Crown Attorney.

Over the years, there has been renovations and maintenance projects. The building now contains renovated court room space in the basement, a motions room on the second floor that is also used for videoconferencing, office space for two judges and for the resident Justice of the Peace, robing rooms for the bar, a law library, a remote testimony room for child witnesses, improved cell space for prisoners who are held at the court house during the day, and the Crown Attorney’s office.

Pierce noted that a source reported that between 1931 and 1945, six men were hanged at Fort Frances as a result of convictions for murder.

“We are no longer hanging people. The nature of the cases heard within these walls varies widely”.

She then went on to explain the various roles of the Justice of the Peace who consider search warrants, preside over bail hearings and Provincial offences trials that might involve driving offences, hunting or fishing infractions, health and safety cases, school attendance, environmental issues or a myriad of other issues.

The Ontario Court of Justice presides over preliminary inquiries, cases about child protection, custody or related matters, young offender charges, criminal trials and pleas or the occasional appeal.

In the Superior Court of Justice, the judge may be occupied with a civil or criminal jury trial, or trials or motions on subjects as diverse as divorce and family law, contracts, aboriginal land claims, negligence, wills and estates, real estate, or municipal law issues.

The Court House employs ten people in the Registrar’s office, two in the Crown Attorney’s office, and two custodians. There are two police officers assigned to the court when it is in session and two additional officers are on duty when there are persons in custody at the court.

Other agencies also provide services to the court when it is in session including a representative from Legal Aid, two court workers from the United Native Friendship Centre as well as a youth justice coordinator. The Canadian Mental Health Association also sends a court worker and the Family Law Information Centre lawyer is in attendance two half-days per month.

Justice Pierce concluded her remarks as follows:

“The court house has served the District of Rainy River well, for these hundred years. Perhaps our descendants will gather to celebrate her bi-centennial. It is right and proper to wish this grand old dame Happy Birthday!”

Remarks were also provided by Lynne Wagner, Assistant Deputy Attorney General Court Services Division who also acted as Master of Ceremony.

She introduced Elder Gilbert Smith to say a few words on behalf of the First Nations communities.

“This is a very important day for me”, he said. “A lot of good things and sad things happen in this court room. That’s the way the system is”. He reflected on the past 100 years and the evolution

Rainy River Fire Dept. is putting out a fundraising calendar

This is a sample page of the new calendar featuring some of the old retired guys. The other pages will feature current firefighters from the department in some pretty “artistic” poses. It will be entertaining for sure. Watch for it, it’s coming out soon!
